

How Might We Build More Resilient Communities?

Building a thriving community culture that shares and grows together, is foundational for any successful project. Throughout history, communities have been brought together by a shared need for survival or deep-rooted traditions. In modern times this is not so much the case.

- Take the time to design a robust social infrastructure into your project to compensate for the lack of more well-rooted traditions
- Communities that share the same vision, and work together to fortify the invisible structure of their community, will fare much better than those who neglected to invest in this crucial component
- Having friendly competition within the community can help compliment the more commonly focused-on spirit of cooperation
 - Games are an enriching element of community design
- Consider creating an agreement among members of your community to dedicate a portion of their time (say 10 hours a week) towards giving back and actively contributing to the community in some way
- Expand your perceptions of community to extend beyond your project to other homesteads and businesses in your region
- Host classes to teach and give back
 - Teach language, cooking, art, crafts, business, or agriculture
- Consider donating a small piece of land to locals where they can use this space to grow their own crops or graze their animals.

To hear more great tips, check out Episode 17 on Building Resilient Communities
<https://sharinginsights.net/podcast/community/>